

Have You Considered Keeping Your Money In An Annuity?

As a non-spousal beneficiary, you may have the option to transfer the death benefit amount into an inherited annuity contract. Inherited contracts may provide a way for you to spread out your tax liability, while allowing your inheritance to continue growing.

What are the benefits of an inherited annuity contract?

Continue the annuity's growth

By placing the death benefit into an inherited contract, your assets may continue to grow, which can provide a significant boost to your inheritance over time.

Spread income tax impact over time

Taking your death benefit as a lump sum payment could leave you with a significant tax burden. By opening an inherited contract, your money will not be taxed until you take a distribution.

You can designate your own beneficiaries

One day you can pass your loved one's generosity on to your heirs.

Are there other important things I should know?

- Timing is important. The IRS requires an inherited IRA to be set up by December 31 of the calendar year following the owner's death. Similarly, an inherited non-qualified contract must be set up by the first anniversary of the owner's death.
- Understand your options. If the death benefit amount is paid directly to you, an inherited contract will no longer be an option. If you decide to open an inherited contract, the death benefit amount will need to stay at Great American or be transferred directly to another insurance carrier.
- Consider RMDs. The IRS requires you to withdraw a minimum amount, known as a Required Minimum Distribution (RMD), from an inherited contract each year.
- Seek advice from a professional. Your decision could have tax or other consequences that you may not have considered. To help avoid surprises, we recommend talking with a tax advisor or a financial professional before you make a decision.
